Lithium battery pack label

What is a lithium battery shipping label? To meet global shipping standards, a lithium battery shipping label must include key regulatory markings, such as the Class 9 hazard label, UN number, handling warnings, orientation arrows, and other relevant information. Shipping lithium batteries isn't just about putting them in a box--it's about full compliance with international transport laws. Do I need a lithium battery label? Note: CAUTION labels are not just stickers. They are a legal requirement under IATA Section 11 and must be used for lithium batteries that are exempt from Class 9 but still regulated. This includes most lithium battery packs shipped in small quantities. Why do lithium-ion batteries need to be labeled? That's why shipments containing lithium-ion batteries fall under strict international regulations. Whether you're dispatching a small consumer device or a large industrial battery pack, compliance is non-negotiable. Improper labelling can lead to fines, shipping delays, and, most importantly, safety hazards. Do lithium batteries have a class 9 label? Otherwise, the specifications have to remain the same. Substances with a Class 9 label are considered miscellaneous dangerous goods--and that includes lithium batteries. Fully regulated lithium battery shipments (such as those under Section IA) must display this label on the outside of the package. Why are battery shipping labels important? The battery shipping labels are mandatory when shipping lithium batteries by air, sea, or road. The labels are important for several key reasons: What is a lithium battery hazard label? These labels contain hazard information and handling instructions, which are crucial for safe transport, especially for lithium batteries. They are designed to be highly visible and resilient, capable of withstanding any environmental conditions that might occur during transportation.
